

New Collaborative Classroom: Pilot Now Open for Tours

We're on target to launch our new Collaborative Classroom in January 2019 and are busy doing the final build-out of the fully connected 96-seat space. Now's the time to think about your classroom needs in the New Year and get onto our timetabling. We're already booking for the winter term – for classes as well as assessments, simulations and ad hoc student groups – and advise you to book early for your first-choice spots.

Pilot space open for tours and training

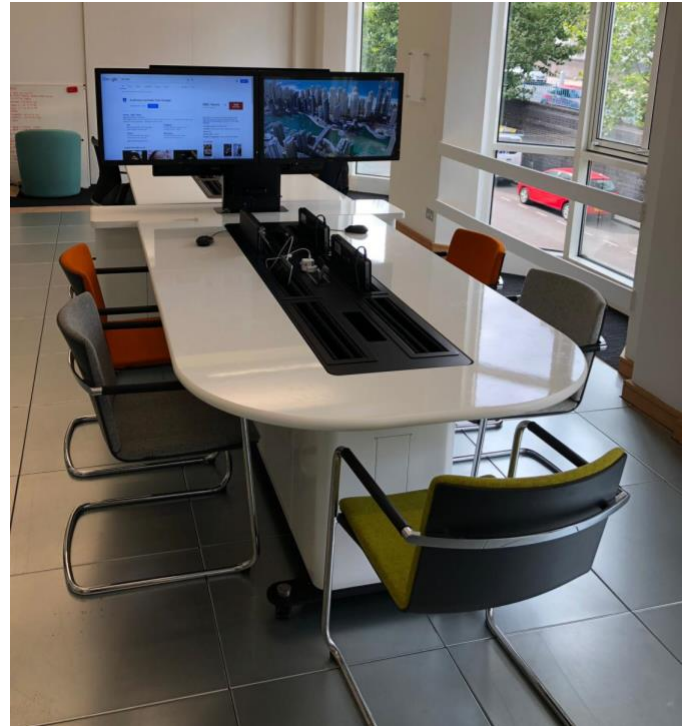

In the meantime, there's a pilot space available with two 6-person workstations up and running. Feel free to come by and take a look at the space any time. We have some training sessions already timetabled in; contact Wayne Buttigieg at wbuttigieg@london.edu if you'd like to book some time yourself. Our new in-room technology with flexible networked AV makes it easier than ever to use your favorite teaching tools and to share content back and forth with your students. In addition to pre-training, there will be initial IT support available from the control room, if requested.

Classroom available for 2019 bookings

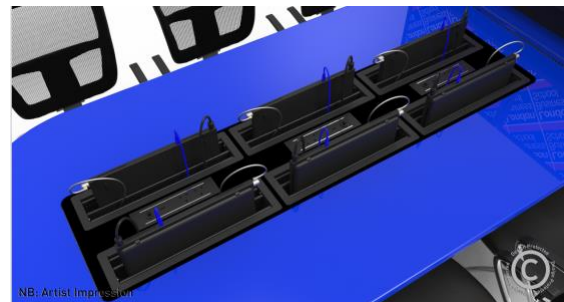

Combining the best features of a lecture theatre, PC lab and social learning hub, the flexible space is designed to support active, collaborative learning and a range of everyday needs. Contact us now to schedule time in the New Year.

NB: Artist Impression

Dual screens at each table can display content from the 98" screens used at the lecture podium. Every student gets a front-row seat!

Laptops with built-in lab software are within arm's reach on each table. When not in use they tuck away neatly to save space.

Left: This new small-group setup maximizes the potential for both teaching and learning.

